The examination of the francophone countries that surround what was the Roman Mare Nostrum and the consideration of francophone literatures and their potential role in the invention of liberties in these regions are at the heart of this book, conceived within the framework of the festivities celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the creation of the of Parliament of Francophones of Belgium.

This volume, which applies itself to the analysis of sociopolitical situations in the Maghreb and in the Mashriq, includes the testimonies of writers gripped by their linguistic and cultural complexities. It also develops questions relating to education as well as a genuine consideration of the francophone literatures present in the countries concerned.

Almost exhaustive, this volume, which relates the remarks made during a symposium held before the "Arab Spring," reveals perspectives on a developing historical context, which is notably the fruit of a francophone occurrence.

What is reported is that regardless of the multiple languages present at the forum, the writers all relate to deep and unequivocal resilience that informs their processes of creation. The voice of each participant shows how francophone literatures are still valuable today because they language to diverse and meaningful issues and experiences.
